Mayor: We’re moving in the right direction
Oh, and by the way, he’s running for re-election

In newspaper parlance, Mayor Jess Alumbaugh buried the lead. The annual state of the city address was more than hour into its speaking portion—not counting the half hour or so that approximately 200 guests had spent enjoying a roast beef luncheon—before the mayor rose to speak.

After thanking all those involved in hosting the event—the Grant County-Marion Chamber of Commerce and Ivy Tech, where the event was held, specifically—he finally got down to the business of addressing the state of the city.

This followed five other speakers:

Chuck Binkerd, of Marion Utilities; Victoria Herring and Mikayla Marazzi of the Grant County Economic Growth Council; Brad Lindsay, superintendent of Marion Community Schools; and Dawn Brown, executive director of The Community Foundation of Grant County. Each spent 10 minutes or more describing the achievements of their organization during the previous year.

Now, though, it was the mayor’s turn.

Still, he had one last minor item to talk about before addressing the elephant in the room: the pumps at the Splash House aren’t working properly.

Finally he got to the finances of the city. Julie Flores “has worked diligently over the last two years, to bring us to a healthier place,” he said, “Are we healthy? No, but we’re moving in the right direction, we’re trending upward. We’re paying our bills on time...”

He said that in 2019 “the insurance fund will hit us at its peak.” That will leave a projected $19,000 left in the General Fund. “Not where we want to be,” Alumbaugh said.

He said that the city has reduced expenses a little over $1.7 million

Artists meet to discuss fostering creative community

By Ed Breen

Five weeks. Ten hours of discussion, probing, poking, analyzing, debating, thinking and talking by nearly 70 men and women from the creative and artistic world of Marion and Grant County and it comes down to this:

There is a need for something that connects, unifies, speaks with a singular and persuasive voice to advocate for musicians, painters, dancers, film makers, sculptors, potters, writers, poets, craftsmen and artisans in Marion.

Something that will bring people—both artists and their patrons—to downtown Marion, a kind of rebirth of an economic dead zone administered by creative people.

But no one knows precisely what that something should look like.

Something with shape and form? A building? Perhaps a fine old Marion structure that can be retrieved from decay and given a new life and deliver prosperity to a neighborhood in need.

A clearinghouse of information, perhaps. Something less costly that will link artist to artist and the artistic community to the larger world. Something described by one of the participants as a “virtual space.”

That is where the heavy lifting begins for the half-dozen people who have become the core of the effort to create an “arts alliance” in Marion.

The group is built around:

- Dr. Greg Fiebig, a professor at Indiana Wesleyan University and creator of the Hoosier a success story in Marion that was launched in a church basement 20 years ago and now is a centerpiece on the Grant County Courthouse Square.

BANKS TOWN HALL

Above left, constituents listen to Congressman Jim Banks (Republican, District 3) (photo at right, facing camera) at a “town hall” meeting in Montpelier Thursday. Banks, who represented Marion and much of Grant County for five years before he was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives two years ago, listened to a crowd of 37 constituents, mainly from Blackford, Jay and Wells counties. While the Congressman said he would discuss all topics of interest, most of the questions dealt with guns—and gun control—in the wake of the 17 deaths in the Florida school shooting.

- Sheila Todd, former manager of the Marion Philharmonic Orchestra and now the development director for the Gardens at Matter Park.
- Kayla Johnson, an employee of municipal government and director of the struggling Main Street Marion program.

Around them are a dozen people who participated consistently through the “listening sessions,” a month of weekly evening gatherings at the Marion Municipal Building capped off with a fifth session held last day in the Tree of Life bookstore Atrium on the Bypass.

Fiebig, who planted the seed for an “arts alliance” with Alumbaugh immediately after his election two years ago, made his argument with two questions:

“What can we do together that we can’t do alone?” he asked the artists in each of the sessions.

And, “What would you want an arts alliance to do for your community?”

The consistent response from the mayor: “I want the downtown thriving,” accompanied by a pledge that, even in light of a very tight municipal budget, “I will find a way to put some skin in the game.” That and a pledge to “get the right business people to the table at the right time.”

“My dream is to have three or four or five things going on downtown very soon to make this a healthier place,” Alumbaugh said, “and the arts are pivotal in changing the culture of Marion.”

Money—and the lack thereof—was addressed in each of the sessions, with Fiebig arguing that the creation of the “arts alliance” is essential in seeking donations and grant money.

“There is an incredible amount of grant money available, and we are in the wheelhouse for one of those grants,” he said. He argued repeatedly that individuals and small organizations do not have the clout and influence that would come from an organization speaking on behalf of all arts efforts in the city.

Several of those organizations were at the table during the discussions, including Marion Civic Theater, Community School of the Arts, Mississinewa Valley Band and arts groups at Indiana Wesleyan University.

Others did not have representation in the talks. Among those absent were the Marion Philharmonic Orchestra, the Grant County Art Association, the Quilters Hall of Fame, the Marion-Grant County Convention and Visitors Bureau and the Historic Wilson-Vaughan House (better known as Hostess House).

Failure of previous attempts to bring unity to the arts was discussed throughout the sessions, cautionary comments to which Fiebig responded: “I do not care what we used to be,” he said. “The question is what do we want to be. And if we are not

DOING GOOD

Each week, The News Herald prepares news of the good being done by individuals and organizations in Grant County for broadcast on WBAT. Here is an adaptation of the transcript of that broadcast.—Ed.

Marion Civic Theater earns a big “thank you!” for providing opportunity for 20 Grant County elementary school students to showcase their acting skills on stage last weekend. They put on a show that they have been practicing since November that allowed them to learn about the theater. Special thanks goes to Director Brandon Dubois and the efforts of all the folks at Marion Civic Theater. Sharing the joy of acting with these 20 young students is a really good thing for our community.

Once again we are able to praise the accomplishments of the Marion careful we are going to create failed attempt once again.”

“I don’t want you to buy my vision,” the IWU professor said, “but I want you to help us answer the question, ‘what does this look like?’”

Katie Morgan, director of CSA and also a member of the Marion School Board, offered a summary question at the Saturday session: “What do you need,” she asked the JROTC cadets rifle team. This year they once again qualified for their National Championships, and improved from their 49th place finish a year ago to 38th place this year. These students display discipline and dedication to have worked so hard all year to improved their skills. The benefits of JROTC go way beyond the skill of shooting a rifle. We applaud the students, their leaders, and Marion Community Schools for hosting this good program.

This week is the boys basketball Sectional tournament and we want to give good wishes to the many young men who have worked so hard to represent their families, their schools, and their communities through basketball. For some this week will mark the end of their high school sports careers, and the lessons they have learned will be good for them in the future. We have seen many of our fine community leaders who learned valuable lessons through high school sports. It’s good for all of us.

We lost a good member of our national community last week with the passing of Evangelist Billy Graham. His good Gospel message, often very simply delivered, has been life changing for millions around the world. The word Gospel means “good news”, so we just had to mention the passing and honor the good news that Billy Graham proclaimed.

Our final thought today comes from the words of Billy Graham: “Some day you will read or hear that Biilly Graham is dead. Don’t you beleive a word of it. I shall be more alive than I am now. I will just have changed my address. I will have gone into the presence of God.”

over the last two years, but, he added, “it’s really getting hard to find other areas to cut.”

“Whether anybody wants to talk about this or not, the need for revenue is real,” Alumbaugh said, “That means taxes, folks.”

Then Alumbaugh slipped in another bit of news: “If I’m elected, and, yes, I’m going to run again, I’m telling you, we need taxes...If you don’t want to vote for me because of that, I understand.”

“My focus is and will be,” Alumbaugh went on to say, “to improve the heart of the city, to bring our downtown to life...We need to have a healthy downtown.”

He mentioned several projects either planned or underway: Halstead Architects have bought a downtown building and plan to renovate it, the city plans to sell the Wolf Building soon, there are plans to build market rate apartments downtown, and Indiana Wesleyan University has plans to lease a building downtown and house 40-50 students there for an urban studies program.

“They want to be a part of our community; they want to be engaged,” said Alumbaugh, “They are a part of our community; they are an asset.”

Alumbaugh then noted that changing the quality of life in the downtown area “is the game-changer.”

“There’s some blight...” he acknowledged, and said that his administration’s approach would be to “clean the front porch up,” by which he meant the two main north-and-south corridors of Adams and Washington Streets and the east and west corridors of Route 18.

“That’s going to be our focus...clean up those main corridors,” Alumbaugh said.

A used washing machine and a blessing

Over the years of ministry, there have been many stories that I like to tell, stories of amazing experiences along the way that make life worth living. As we journey through this life there should be many events that we can hold on to that show us the grace of God and the unconditional love He continually bestows on us.

I have always kept a “to do” list that starts me out on my Monday morning. However, there have been lots of times that I never had the chance to work the list because of other issues that come my way. Now don’t get me wrong, everybody should have a plan of attack for every day of the week, and we should always be ready to work the plan. The plan, even though vital to some type of productivity, should never hold us hostage. Things do come up that change the plan.

This brings me to the story of the used washer. One Monday morning we received word that there was a widow lady in the community that hadn’t had a washer for two years. I was on the phone talking to a dear friend (Corrine McAdams) and I told her the story. Corrine is already in Heaven today, and I still miss her. She said, “Honey, let me take care of this.” In no time, she called me back with all the information about a used washer from

JUST A THOUGHT

Rev. Tom Mansbarger

Jim’s Appliances for $140, and they would deliver it. Then she proceeded to tell me that she was going to get fourteen people to give $10 apiece. It doesn’t seem like much of a sacrifice, but she asked me if I would give $10. I told her I would, and she went on to tell me that she would give 10, and we only needed 12 more. In a matter of one hour she had raised the money and the washer was on its way. Fourteen people helped a widow do what she couldn’t do, but it was done with no effort or sacrifice at all.

Good things done to help others have always been a joy to me and brings great satisfaction. I am not really a detail person, and I never gave a second thought to who the other 12 contributors were. I just knew that Corinne had called a few people, and it was a $10 investment.

It wasn’t until after Corinne’s death that I heard the rest of the story. You see, Corinne knew lots of influential people, and they greatly respected her. One of the individuals on the list was one of the wealthiest people in Grant County. When Corinne called him, he wanted to send a check for the entire amount. She quickly responded by telling him that she only wanted $10, just like the rest. I have told this story many times and it has brought great satisfaction to me. Not that one person with great means wanted to do it all, but rather, that 14 people received a blessing by realizing when God’s people come together good things happen. If we could all just give a little, much could be accomplished. Who would think that an old used washer could bring such joy to 15 people? My prayer is that you will see the need and let others help you supply it. Little is much when God is in it.

Services were held on Wednesday February 21, at Ferguson & Glancy Funeral Home, Van Buren. Online condolences may be made at glancyfuneralhomes.com.

Eyeing the Democratic gubernatorial hopefuls

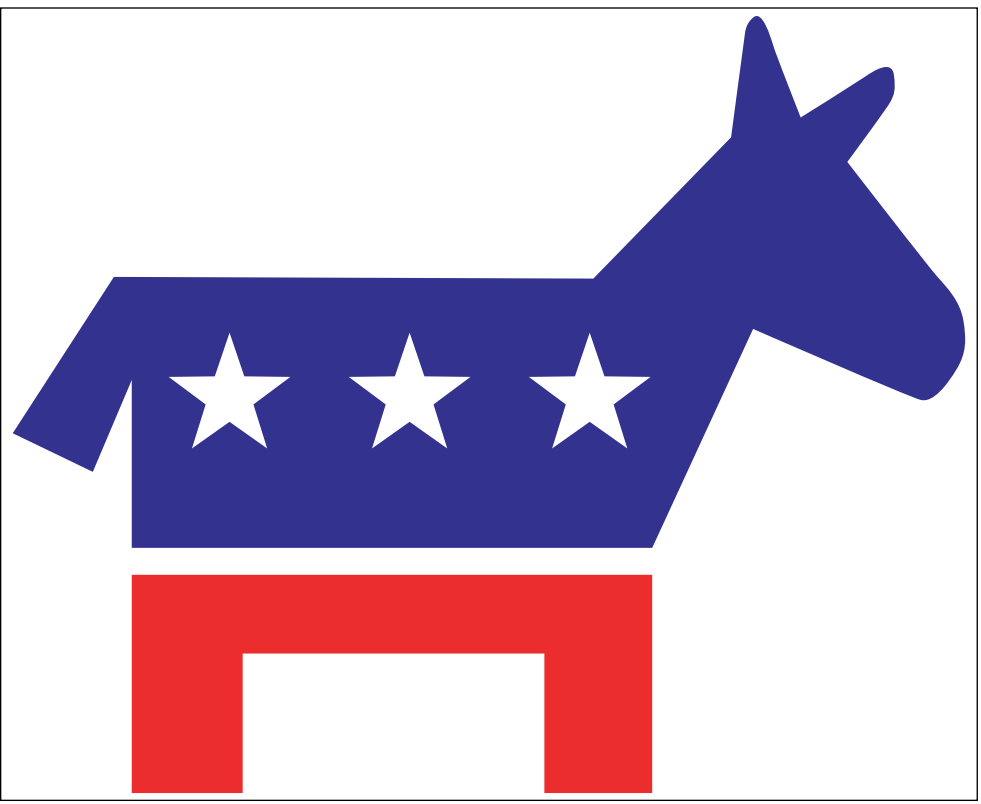

As though we didn’t have enough politics to drive us straight to the Home and Garden channel to hide out, today we’re going to go straight to 2020, pretending that the midterm elections and county election this year aren’t going to happen at all. But we’re not headed where you think. Nary a word about presidential stuff. That will more than take care of itself.

Instead, we’re going to do some idle speculation on Democrats who might like to run against Eric Holcomb for governor.

Holcomb, of course, is a sort of accidental governor who, at the moment, seems to be both savvy and popular, although it is way too soon to start building him a monument right up there beside the sainted Doc Bowen.

Holcomb, a low-key lieutenant in the time of Mitch Daniels, was anointed by Mike Pence during the hemorrhaging days of the Pence governorship to be Number 2, to succeed Sue Ellspermann who had been dispatched to head up Ivy Tech.

Then, of course, the heavens opened and the waters parted and Pence was off to the vice presidency of the whole United States, leaving Eric Holcomb to fend for himself against the wily and crafty old Democrat John Gregg.

Once again the heavens opened and the waters parted and Eric Holcomb rode the coattails of Donald Trump right into the governor’s office, where he has done, by most measurements, a better job than was expected of him.

But Democrats are still chaffing from the Trump onslaught. John Gregg was supposed to be governor, but it didn’t happen.

Right now—and keep in mind that 2020 is several light years away—right now it look as though there are eight waiting in the wings for a chance to lead a Democrat resurgence.

We start with Gregg himself, and we turn to Bryan Howey, who watches this stuff like a hawk. Says Howey: “No modern Hoosier politician has run or been nominated three times. Usually you get one crack at it, but Gregg pulled it all together only to be swamped by the Trump/Pence wave. It’s unlikely he goes a third time in 2020.”

And let’s dispose of the legendary Hoosier name Evan Bayh. The governor-cum-senator took a thumping from Todd Young in 2016; still, never forget he is a Bayh. Again, here’s Mr. Howey: “If Indiana Democrats make significant inroads into GOP super majorities, or actually took a chamber in this year’s elections, both Bayh and Gregg might show a new level of interest.”

So, a quick trot around the infield here:

There’s Christina Hale. She ran for lieutenant governor with Gregg two years ago. “I’m sure I’ve been the hardest working non-candidate in 2017,” she said. Some Democrats have approached her to run for secretary of state this year, but she prefers to stay on the gubernatorial track. The question there is whether she goes in 2020 or, more likely, waits for a potential open seat in 2024.

Pete Buttigieg. The two-term South Bend mayor is a rising star, but a number of Democrats see his interests nationally rather than here at home. He has appeared in Iowa recently and many believe he’d be more likely to seek the vice presidential nomination in 2020.

Greg Goodnight, our neighbor and mayor of Kokomo. If his wife, Kelly, weren’t battling health issues, Goodnight would in position to run, but it’s unlikely at this point.
