Food

we go into the market and buy food and offer that out to agencies that can order that food from us.”

Along with that, Second Harvest utilizes what they call the Tailgate Distribution Program. Box trucks, semis, or a combination of both head to a pre-advertised site. From there, food items such as fresh produce, meal kits, and canned goods are distributed in a drive-thru fashion. Volunteers, as well as the National Guard, load the food into vehicles in a quick and orderly manner, which makes the process streamlined and efficient.

Under normal circumstances, Second Harvest holds nine tailgate distribution events throughout the eight counties that they serve, but with COVID-19 continuing to leave its mark across the state, they have nearly tripled their output. In April alone, which included this past Saturday at Five Points Mall, Second Harvest has had 26 distribution events.

But until the COVID-19 pandemic comes to an end, Kean and his team of dedicated staff and volunteers will continue to provide East Central Indiana with much needed relief.

“That’s what our hope is, and if need be, we will ramp up even further,” Kean said. “The economic crisis that this has created is going to be ongoing for quite some time and may actually create more need. We see this as a potentially long-term circumstance.

“We are planning this as a long-term initiative. It’s not something that is going to go away in the next few weeks or maybe even the next few months. Folks can count on our organization to continue to step forward and do whatever is in our power to make sure people have enough food to eat.”

For those looking to donate to the Second Harvest Food Bank, you can visit their website at cure-hunger.org for more information.

“Financial contributions are the first step in terms of making a difference for us,” Kean said. “It’s amazing the amount of people that are doing that.”

Second Harvest will be back in Marion from 10 am to noon on Friday, May 1, at the Five Points Mall.
