

Dawning of a new era

just wasn’t what I expected to be, and it kind of drained my love of the game and my passion for playing. I just decided to take a step away from it a little bit of time to reevaluate.”

He took some time off, heading back home to Clarks Summit, Pennsylvania, to regroup himself, and as time passed, his passion for the game began to return. After some prayer and thoughtful consideration, Maxwell realized that he wanted to finish out his college career.

He originally thought about going back to D1 basketball, but due to NCAA rules, he would have to sit out a year before he could play again, leaving him just one year of college eligibility.

But then, IWU came into the picture, and quickly, he realized that the Wildcats’ program was different. It was not all about basketball, glory, or championships at IWU. It was about bringing glory to God through basketball, all while lifting others up around you.

“At the end of the day, the conversations I was having with the coaches, and the emphasis of caring for their players off the court...was ultimately what drove me to [IWU],” Maxwell said. “There was such an emphasis on leadership and growth off the court that ultimately mattered more. That was really appealing to know I would be spending my last two years in an environment where I could get better at basketball, I could still be set up to play professionally, and I can still play high-level competition and compete for championships.

“Most importantly, I was going to be with a bunch of men who cared about other things other than just basketball. I could share my love of basketball.”

Coming from a major college environment, Maxwell welcomed the change, and quickly became immersed in the IAmThird philosophy.

“Being in that culture was refreshing for me,” Maxwell said. “The reasons I had chosen to come were bigger than basketball, and then to come here and see it wasn’t just all talk and to see that it was legit and authentic...was [awesome.] The things they were offering here are different than playing time or exposure. Everything was backed up when I got here, and that was refreshing to see it in action.”

After starting the season on the bench, Maxwell started 31 contests for the Wildcats at center, averaging 17.5 points and 6.7 rebounds per contest.

“He was 6-10, massive, and skilled,” Mangas said. “We were so excited just to add that. That was a game changer. He was an offensive weapon, and a guy who could get a bucket when you needed him too.”

He finished second on the team with 665 points, while shooting a scorching 58 percent from the floor.

“Evan and Kyle were obviously our two offensive threats that year,” Coffey said. “Both of them were just killers, so we could lean on both of those guys for a big bucket when we needed it. Even though Kyle was a freshman, he still had that mentality of you couldn’t stop him once he got going. Both of them had that next level they could get to.”
