say believes that all the kinks will be worked out with more time.

“Not everything went perfectly...but [the issues] were minor,” Lindsay said. “There are minor COVID protocol details to iron out on campus and with our online learners, but we are working those things out. There were no major things that cannot be solved. It was all the minor things that we needed to iron out with communication and connection. We’re learning. This is new for us. So, we are going to learn along the way. I’m thankful for our families’ patience and cooperation with us.”

While this return to school has been a period of adjustment for the students, it’s also thrown teachers out of their normal routine.

However, Marion’s educators have met the challenges head on, finding innovative ways to solve problems and continue to teach at an effective level.

“We had solid plans coming in, and a lot of collaboration and cooperation,” Lindsay said. “In every classroom at every school, they are adapting, and our teachers are very good at thinking on their feet and problem solving to make things work smoothly for their classrooms and their students.”

It’s only been one week, and a lot can change at a moment’s notice when it comes to COVID-19. Overall, it’s been an encouraging start.

“We are just glad to have school again,” Lindsay said. “We love our Giants, and we want to serve the city of Marion.”
