them back,] Starkey concluded. “They see the same people that they don’t see the entire year until they come back to a place like this. We live in a free country, and I am pleased to be part of it.”

As much as could be done, social distancing was adhered too, and hand-washing stations were put up all over the park. Temperatures of all the volunteers were taken before each day began, and all in attendance had to follow the various health guidelines that have been in place over the last few months in the state of Indiana.

Despite these changes, however, Starkey believed that this year’s event was as successful as it’s always been – not only for the town of Fairmount, but for Grant County as a whole.

“All winter long, we are cooped up in our house because it’s cold, and then, you get that nice spring day and you feel like a flower wanting to bloom,” Starkey said. “That’s the way that these people have been. Everybody seems to be happy and smiling. This group, by and far, is thrilled to be here.

“We are fortunate that the town of Fairmount opens this up to let people not only come in and look at cars but look at our great town and our county. We are very pleased to help support Grant County and Fairmount.”
