COVID

Moore reiterated that the issue is no longer about a lack of knowledge about the COVID-19 virus. Rather, it's about people wanting to return to a sense of normalcy, and thus not complying with the guidelines established by the Grant County Health Department and the State of Indiana, which directly correlates to the rise in

While there is frustration on all sides of the

as serious as others to join in the conversation in order to see the severity of the disease and how it has affected the lives of so many.

"Simply [hitting] people over the head and pushing them harder isn't going to change behavior," Moore said. "We need to understand one another and why the people who aren't even doing the basic things aren't doing them."

Above all, it's about keeping others safe, according to Futrell, and by continuing to follow the guidelines until the vaccine is ready to be widely distributed will make a return to normal life much more of a reality.

"It is about us all working together to get this slowed down to the point where we can manage it like we did in the spring," Futrell said. "[The community] needs to protect one another. Protect your family, protect your parents, protect your grandparents, and protect your children. We understand people want to be together. We love community...but in this particular year and this particular time, we are just putting others at risk. [We want] to break the cycle so we can all get back to some normalcy."
